Biographical Sketch

The Central Conference of American Rabbis, founded in July 1889 in Detroit, Michigan, was the successful attempt by Isaac M. Wise and the Reform movement to establish a rabbinical association. Earlier attempts by Louis Salomon in 1841, and Isaac M. Wise in 1846, 1848, 1855, 1869, 1871, 1879 and 1885 were unsuccessful. Not until the organization of a congregational union in 1873 (Union of American Hebrew Congregations) and the founding of a rabbinical seminary in 1875 (Hebrew Union College) was the necessary groundwork established which eventually led to the formation of the CCAR. By 1970 the membership of the Conference numbered more than 1,000 rabbis residing primarily in the United States and Canada.

The CCAR regarded itself as the successor of the Reform rabbinical councils of 1840s Germany and of similar meetings in Philadelphia (1869) and Pittsburgh (1885), but never formally adopted their resolutions and platforms, seriatim, as its own program. The CCAR, however, pursued a "classical" proto-German Reform position for more than four decades until its members gradually came under the influence of Zionism and Eastern European traditionalism, and, in Columbus, Ohio, in 1937 adopted a set of principles which was less radical and theoretical than earlier Reform formulations.

The CCAR was a pioneer American rabbinical organization in such fields as social action, church and state problems, interfaith relationships, the military chaplaincy, religious leadership for college youth, and religious education. Its siddur, the Union Prayer Book, first published in 1892 and subsequently revised a number of times, was a unifying link among Reform congregations throughout the country.
